the Druids, the Ancient Churches, and the Round Towers of Ireland (Classic Reprint):

Excerpt from An Essay on the Druids, the Ancient Churches, and the Round Towers of Ireland Whatever may be the character of the following Essay, it is the result of considerable study and inquiry. In the first place, the subjects of which it treats could never be approached without a knowledge of the Celtic language. That, in itself, would require the labour and application of much time. There are, and have been, distinguished antiquaries in Ireland who could not pronounce a single sentence in the Irish language. Yet, to know that language well, without being able to speak it, is an utter impossibility; for it is essentially more a language of the tongue than of the letter. It was once the speech of a vast number of the human race. Probably, it was the first language spoken by man. At the present day fragments of it are found in most countries of the world, even in India and among the original tribes of America.
