Federico Squarcini : Tradition, Veda and Law: Studies on South Asian Classical Intellectual Traditions (Cultural, Historical and Textual Studies of South Asian Religions) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Tradition, Veda and Law: Studies on South Asian Classical

Intellectual Traditions (Cultural, Historical and Textual Studies of South Asian Religions):

The essays presented in this volume constitute a progression from general considerations related to the etic (in the geertzian sense of the word) approach to South Asian cultural productions, to peculiar and detailed investigations of them. Such a sequence is meant to develop a renovated and systemic approach, through which these specific cultural materials should be interpreted: materials not to be read in isolation, nor with an overemphasised concern for cultural relativity. Rather, they should be viewed as meaningful examples of sophisticated intellectual and cultural procedures to be included into a broader comparative discussion, also in order to increase the quality and the depth of such debate.

[T]hese contributions give us an excellent series of conceptual case studies of how to do more with normative texts than affirm or deny their applicability or reality. By reaching out to contemporary theoretical work, Squarcini shows how perennial topics of ideology-formation, the politics of contested language, and the non-physical effects of punishment may be studied through the lens of even ancient Sanskrit intellectual traditions.
